"Most excited of all the enthus actic persons that made up the au-dience at the auto race was a pretty, dark-eyed girl, whose voice sounded above the tumult, 'Oh, I'm a glad Joe won! I knew he would!' she Then, while the usual joy-mail dened throng encircled Jos, he put his arms around the girl and kissed her and announced that he had won more than the race—the girl. Well, that was good reading, but

Joe didn't win the girl, who was Miss Fannie Collins, only fifteen years old again after she had married Francis Woodhull Coles jr., a wealthy brokes living in Tarrytown.

However, Mrs. Coles did not go to Maxico. Instead, she spent most of her time automobifing with Tracy, it is charged. And Joe wrote her poetry. Here is a sample verse, dedicated to "My Pipey":

I sit alone against the wall
And strive to look at ease.
The incense that is mine by right,
They bums before her shrine.
That's because sho's twenty-one
And I am thirty-nine."

To this Lament of the Wallflows Jos's "Pipey" responded in verse a follows, under the title "Together": From land to land, from sea to sea, In every spot and clime, Where'er thou art there shall I be Until the end of time.

Through trouble deep, through joy With calm, unchanging heart, Where'er thou goest I shall go Until death do us part.

To Hades' depths, to Heaven above, While night time follows day. I will follow thee on the wings of low Forever and for aye.

Until death—aye, and after, too,
With smooth untravelled brow.
For wa've been too long together, love
For DEATH to part us now.

These lines were found in Mrs. Coles's trunk after she had left a little apartment in Jersey City, where it is charged she had been visited by Tracy and had told friends she was the racing man's wife.

According to witnesses, the romance of Jos and Fanny is over. Letters were found in which Mrs. Coles declared she was going to die, because Joe had sent word that after June 20 he would never see her again. Mrs. Coles in the letters solemnly vowed she would commit suicide, but didn't because, she said, she had something size to do.

Justice Cohalan took the case under advisement.
